

The Doctors (to be) Are In

TSN FEATURE STORY

Last month, Tim and Dayle Seneff helped welcome the charter class of the new University of Central Florida College of Medicine at a special White Coat Ceremony. White coating ceremonies, followed by a student pledge of professionalism, are a tradition among first-year medical students, but UCF's first such ceremony was extra special because the students were coated by benefactors who paid for their entire four-year education—an unprecedented gesture, according to the American Medical Association. The scholarships were funded by $7 million in community donations from across the region and CNL Charitable Foundation, Inc. was one sponsor. “Having a high caliber medical school in Orlando is exciting on so many levels,” says Tim, pictured here with Mabel Avilas, first in her family to even attend college. “It was a very moving experience to see students from all over the U.S. and the world begin to pursue their medical dreams here in Orlando – our home town.”
